KNOW YOUR ARTIST

I love spending my time creating art, whether it's playing around with watercolours or sketching random ideas that come to mind. Drawing helps me relax and express myself, and I'm always up for trying new styles and improving with every piece I make

THE ENIGMA of INKTOBER

The Story Of A Wolf And A Rabbit. About myth that there is a rabbit who lives on the Moon. Overall Theme-The Predator and The Prey.

Riya Kapoor

This piece was never meant to be perfect, it was more like a moment of peace I created for myself. I started drawing without really knowing what it would turn into but as the lines began to connect it slowly started to feel like a reflection of how life moves.

The symmetry is not about precision, it is about balance the kind we try to find within ourselves when everything feels a bit too much. For me this artwork is about letting go and trusting the process allowing things to unfold naturally one line at a time.

Usnik Mondal - the inktober conqueror

A special mention to a committed member from the art club—Silhouette—for successfully completing the challenge of the month of inktober with full attendance. 30 sketches for 30 days. All made with dedication, intensity and passion for learning and trying something new. Congratulations !

I'm Usnik Mondal, my course is Btech CSE 1th first year and I'm a self-taught artist who finds expression through ink. My work draws inspiration from manga, perspective—exploring the emotions hidden between form and shadow. Whether it's the introspection of Vagabond, or the quiet geometry of a temple, I aim to capture feeling through texture and contrast.

Inspired by Koko no Hito, this artwork captures the silent struggle and solitude of climbing — both physical and emotional. The figure's posture and stark tones reflect the harsh beauty of isolation, the cold determination to keep ascending despite the void around. It represents the stillness of the mountain and the weight of one's inner climb.

Inspired by Initial D, this piece captures the intensity of a midnight mountain race — headlights slicing through the dark, engines roaring across narrow curves. The panel layout mirrors the manga's iconic rhythm and tension, freezing speed into still frames. Each line carries the energy of the drift — a mix of focus, adrenaline, and the quiet passion that drives every racer down the mountain.

The heart of the Art

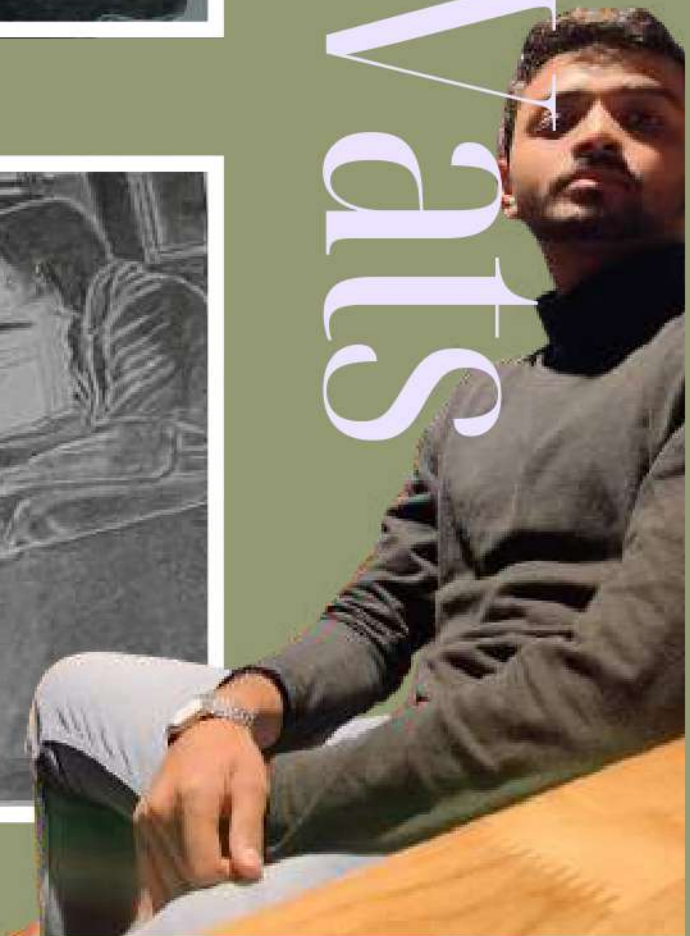

A detailed architectural sketch capturing the quiet grace of traditional East Asian design. Every line emphasizes balance — between structure and emptiness, precision and flow. The layered roofs, wooden textures, and stone steps echo a timeless rhythm, inviting stillness within complexity. Drawn entirely in pen, this piece reflects patience, observation, and the art of finding beauty in structure.

This isn't just a fall... It's the moment between breaking and becoming. When silence screams, and the soul chooses to rise not with noise, but with light.
My Art represents what happens when art meets divinity.

ABOUT

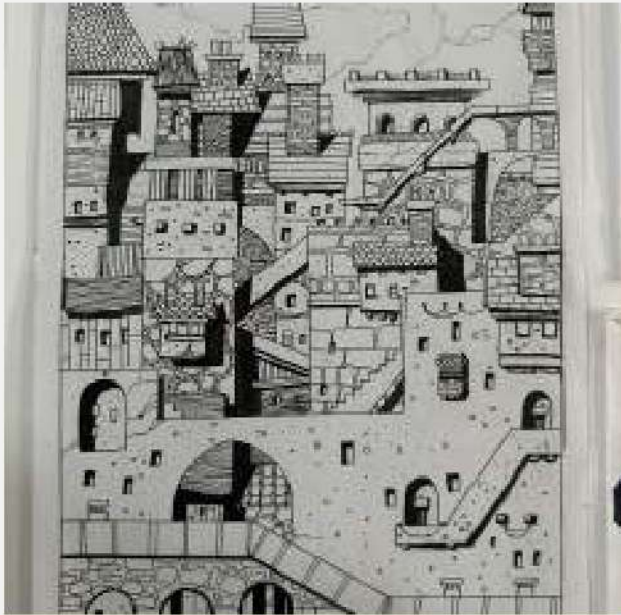

KANAK MEHRA

This painting is my recreated version of Raja Ravi Varma's iconic Shakuntala, a masterpiece from the era often called the Indian Renaissance. The scene depicts Shakuntala, a character from Kalidasa's Sanskrit play Abhijnanasakuntalam, pretending to remove a thorn from her foot while secretly looking for her beloved, King Dushyanta. The work captures both the grace of Ravi Varma's style and the romantic idealism of classical Indian art.

TITLE: SHAKUNTALA (REPLICA)
MEDIUM: ACRYLIC ON CANVAS

AND THE WORLD
THROUGH HER
“EYES”

Sometimes silence says more than words ever could.
Her eyes don't seek attention — they hold stories, unspoken and strong.
The wind may move her hair, but not her calm.
A single tear can hold an entire world.
There's beauty in what we try to hold back.
A tear balanced at the edge — fragile, but brave.
Even in pain, the light finds a way to reflect.
The reflection of light feels like honesty, raw and unhidden.

ARTIST NOTE

This piece is all about chaos bleeding into form. I used messy, tangled lines on purpose like every stroke is a nervous twitch or a thought spiraling out of control. The figures aren't monsters exactly; they're emotions fighting each other, confusion feeding on fear. It's what it feels like when your head's too loud and you can't tell who's winning, you or the darkness inside. The one with wide eyes, it's not attacking, it's desperate, hungry for something real. The other, screaming, is just collapsing under the weight of it all. The whole scene's raw and ugly on purpose, 'cause sometimes that's the truest way to show what it means to be human, broken, scared, and still trying to make sense of the noise.

Using colors and meaning in arrangements

This piece was my take on the Pierce prompt; an innocent bird, caught in a moment that feels violent yet strangely calm. The line work carries that tension; it feels like I killed, yet I didn't. There's beauty in the stillness, in the contradiction. I didn't finish Inktober, but this one stayed with me, like a quiet reminder of intent without completion.

Pari Mittal

The Camel

A handcrafted bell metal sculpture of a resting camel, mounted on a black base. The intricate detailing on its body captures traditional artistry, symbolizing endurance, grace, and desert heritage.

The Art of Mix and Match

A textured clay sculpture of a waterfall cascading over rocks, with a human figure lying below. It portrays surrender to nature's power — the serenity and transience of life flowing like water.

As morphed as clay

A clay sculpture depicting a bird emerging from within a ribcage — symbolizing freedom, hope, and the soul's resilience. The contrast between the fragile ribs and the bird's gentle form reflects the coexistence of confinement and liberation.

CHAHAT GAUTAM

This pencil drawing depicts a woman with long hair and a butterfly lightly shielding one eye. The artist applies soft shading and delicate lines to achieve depth and emotion, with beauty and mystery merged. The painting evokes a feeling of transformation and silent contemplation.

HARIKA SRIRAMAGIRI

DIVYA SAINI

This artwork reflects the idea that the universe lives within us. The handprint symbolizes human existence — real yet cosmic — holding galaxies of emotion and energy inside. The sun and moon represent balance and duality, while the stars remind us of beauty within chaos. The phrase “In this world, it’s just us” speaks of connection and unity — a reminder that even in the vastness of the universe, we are never truly alone.

The near-touch of the lips reflects intimacy, desire, and vulnerability. It symbolize the magnetic pull between souls — how connection can blur boundaries and merge two entities into something transcendent
